T. S. Eliot's poem is a complex work that explores themes ranging from despair and decay to redemption.

Though it has no rhyme, "The Waste Land" does contain many examples of internal rhyme, as well as extensive use of alliteration and repetition. These techniques are used throughout the poem's five sections (tertia pars), which Eliot himself later divided into four parts in his 1923 introduction to the text:

- The Broken Hierarchy ("Burnt Norton")
- Death by Water ("A Game of Chess")
- Fire (The Fire Sermon)
- Time and the River ("What the Thunder Said"/"Punishment and Law")

== Poem ==

=== The Broken Hierarchy === The first section, also known as the "Tale of the Waste Land", consists of five parts (the second to fifth being subsections) with a prologue and epilogue. This part deals heavily on spirituality and despair through an excerpt from "Burnt Norton", a story Eliot tells about his childhood involving a dream he had in which there was a broken staircase leading up to the top of a tall tower (the Tower). The prologue, as well as section one's subsection five, contain lines that directly speak on spirituality and salvation.

The first part begins with two images: an old woman who has lost her son from "Tiresias" and then quickly cuts to the speaker talking about his own loss of a friend or lover in "A Game of Chess".

This connection between the two ideas is made through allusion, as Tiresias was said to be blinded by Apollo. The woman's dream ends, she wakes up and goes back to sleep:

The second part is a quote from "Datta", an Indian prayer which means 'Gone, gone', and serves as the introduction to The Fire Sermon. It also introduces the speaker's journey on his quest for redemption by stating that he has been searching through many lands, cultures and religions in order to find some semblance of salvation or meaning in life;

The third part is a reference to the Indian Vedic text Rigveda (RV 1.90). Here Eliot's speaker tells of his search for spiritual enlightenment and asks if anyone can answer him:

The fourth part is an allusion to John Donne's poem "Batter my heart, three-person'd God", which asks God to allow himself into one's heart and take control of their life:

The fifth part is an allusion from the Upanishads, which are ancient Indian philosophical texts that deal with a variety of religious themes such as spirituality, metaphysics, ethics, etc.:

The epilogue serves as a re-introduction to Eliot's speaker, who is still searching for his purpose in life:

=== Death by Water === Eliot describes the "death of art" (as well as death) in this section. The narrator begins with a list of images from different cultures, each one representing a facet of modern culture's corruption and decay. He also uses these images to describe his journey into India searching for enlightenment:

This section also begins with a quote from "Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam", an English translation of verses written by Persian poet Omar Khayyam. The speaker describes his search for the meaning or purpose in life as well as how he sees death, which is portrayed in this poem as something that leads to a spiritual awakening:

In the fourth part Eliot quotes lines taken from "The Waste Land", referring to how art has lost its meaning in a modern world filled with death and decay:

This section concludes with the narrator's dream in which he sees a beautiful woman who is dying after being wounded by an arrow from Cupid:

This woman is Lady Pastrana, who was betrayed by one of her suitors in the end:

In this dream, Eliot writes "the woman is dead in the sense both of death and spiritual emptiness".

=== Fire Sermon === The speaker tells us that he has been to a bar called The Wasteland (a reference to T.S. Eliot's poem) at 3am with his cousin Ezra, where they drank absinthe "in the old fashioned way" ("Gargoyles", lines 256–7). They are soon joined by an American lady and her husband who were visiting London; this party consists of seven people in total. The narrator then begins to describe what happened next:

The narrator is referring to himself in the third person as he tells us that his cousin Ezra "had no medicine for anything" ("Gargoyles", line 379). The party then leaves the bar, with two women going home and the rest of them (including Eliot's speaker) going back to an inn called The White Horse.

Eliot then describes how he and his party go into an alleyway that has many graffiti on it. In this section, Eliot also tells us about the history of London: The narrator continues to describe his party's actions as they "made their way, stumbling" through that alleyway ("Gargoyles", lines 341–2). The speaker then goes on to say: This image of a woman drawing water is an allusion to "The Burial of the Dead", one of Eliot's early poems that was published by "Poetry" magazine in February 1914, which describes how people have forgotten their spiritual roots and are no longer connected with nature.

This image also contains another reference to T.S. Eliot's poem "The Waste Land": the narrator compares this woman to the first woman described in that earlier work who, as he puts it, is "half shaven... half naked" ("A Game of Chess", lines 125–6). The image also contains a reference to Buddhist philosophy which says that we are all connected with each other.

This image then leads to a description of an encounter between the narrator and another woman who appears out of nowhere while he is watching this scene: The two women then engage in a conversation about the current state of things in London. The narrator asks her what she thinks is going on and how it affects her life: She responds that there seems to be a lot of "noise" in the city, which she compares to being trapped by a cage with no key. The noise and distraction prevent her from thinking about anything else other than how miserable things are: She then goes on to describe a scene that she saw in the city. She tells him of two men who were sitting by each other eating food from a bucket and how their appearance reminded her of some "monks" ("The Fire Sermon", lines 405–12).

She then goes on to say that she doesn't know where these men came from and how it is possible for them to live in this way. She tells him about a young boy who was sitting near her, listening to music while he played his guitar:

She then proceeds to say that this child is not "the same" as these other people. She tells him about how, in the past, she used to play music but had stopped doing so because of all the pain and suffering in the world:

This child then goes on to sing songs that remind her of when she used to play music as well. She also says how there is still hope for humanity and that people should not give up or stop trying, but continue doing everything they can:

The woman then goes on to tell him about a man who was sitting by himself in another part of town and how she decided to go talk with him. She tells Eliot's speaker that although he tried to have a conversation with the old man, it seemed like there wasn't much they could say:

She then goes on to tell how she asked this man if he has ever been in love. She also asks if he can remember what it felt like when he was falling in love and if the memory still makes his heart beat faster:

The old man then tells her that there is only "one time" of falling in love, which he says happened during World War One when he was young and single. He also mentions how his heart used to beat very fast whenever he would see a girl walking towards him:

The old man then goes on to describe an encounter with the person who made his heart beat so much back then. She was wearing red shoes and her name was Marie Curie:

The old man tells how, on the day he met this young woman, his heart "leaped up" inside of him because he liked what she was wearing:

However, the old man also goes on to say that there is always something wrong with people and how things are not perfect. He then says that he thinks this woman was "giving herself" away because she wasn't very bright:

The old man also goes on to say that, at the time when they met each other, he and this woman had just lost their fiancé who died in the war. He tells how it seemed like things were never going to be alright again for them:

The old man then goes on to talk about other people that he has met in his life, such as a young girl named Annette who had an accident and lost her eyesight. He tells how she used to make things out of clay when they were younger:

The old man also talks about a young woman named Marie who died while giving birth to her child and how this made him think that life can sometimes be very unpredictable:

The old man also talks about a young boy named Paul who died during an air raid while he was playing by his bedroom window. The old man tells how this made him wonder what would have happened if Paul had lived:

The woman then goes on to tell the narrator that she wants to do something about all of these things that are happening and how people need more hope in their lives. She tells him: The woman then leaves the narrator, who is left alone to think about everything he has just heard and seen.

== Structure == "The Waste Land" consists of four parts: "The Burial of a Dream," "What the Thunder Said," "A Game of Chess," and "What the Thunder Said." The poem is composed in free verse. It makes use of different types of meter, including iambic pentameter. Its style draws heavily on allusion (a common literary technique used by T. S. Eliot), with references to ancient Greek mythology, Hindu philosophy and contemporary literature, as well as the Bible and the Quran. "The Burial of a Dream" is composed primarily of stanzas that are eight lines long. "What the Thunder Said," also known as "Today Is the 40th Day," consists of twelve six-line stanzas, which in turn contain four three-line stanzas called tercets. "A Game of Chess" is composed of ten five-line stanzas and "What the Thunder Said" is followed by a final eight lines that function as an epilogue to the poem.

The entire poem can be divided into two sections: "The Burial of a Dream," which contains the first, second, third and fourth parts, and "What the Thunder Said," which comprises the fifth, sixth and seventh parts along with its epilogue (although this division is not always made). Written in four sections, it opens with the burial of a dead man's dream, symbolizing all hope. The first section describes a journey through different locations that reflect various states of mind: from London to Paris, Jerusalem and finally to a deserted pool where he meets two women who discuss their lives. This part is filled with references to ancient mythology, religion and philosophy; for instance, the poem opens with an allusion to Ovid's Metamorphoses. The second section begins in medias res (that is, "in the middle of things") as a woman sings about her past experiences when she was young and loving. This part uses Biblical verses from Isaiah 43:18-20 to convey that love can never die despite any hardship or adversity in life; it only undergoes transformations. The third section is a dialogue between two people who are playing chess, symbolizing the battle of good and evil as well as the futility of trying to solve human problems through violence. It also shows that no one can escape death by living according to religious beliefs or moral codes; even when they pray for guidance in life, their lives end up being meaningless just like a chess game where "the king is dead." The fourth section returns back to the first scene and describes how everything has become barren as time passes. It ends with an epilogue that repeats much of what was said earlier by one of the women; this part shows that human life will continue even after everyone dies because people keep trying to find meaning in their lives.

== Allusions == The poem contains allusions from many different sources, both historical and contemporary. Some examples are:

=== Ancient === * The first section of the poem opens with a quotation taken from Ovid's Metamorphoses ("Scylla and Charybdis"), which was written in 8 AD as an explanation for why Scylla lost her head after she bit off Odysseus' leg. This allusion is used to symbolize the danger that lies on both sides of life: * The poem also makes reference to the mythical Hindu figure Krishna in its second section: "What the Thunder Said". Taking inspiration from Hinduism's Bhagavad Gita, Eliot quotes a line from that text (chapter 18 verse 26) when he states: * T. S. Eliot's "the dry statement of history" alludes to Herodotus, who in his Histories described life before the Greek colonization of Ionia:

- Eliot also refers to Homer's "Odyssey" when he writes:
- The last section ("What the Thunder Said") mentions the Greek mythological hero Aeneas and Virgil's "Aeneid" as a parallel to Eliot's Writings, specifically: "The Wasteland" is called by T. S. Eliot his own modern epic on the same lines as Virgil's.

=== Biblical === * The poem makes allusions to Psalm 121 ("I lift my eyes to the mountains") and Isaiah 43:18-20 ("Ye are my witnesses, saith the LORD, and my servant whom I have chosen": "The Waste Land" also refers to Isaiah in a manner that is both direct (see above) and indirect. * The poem makes reference to Jesus's life by using verses from the New Testament: "But when shall these things be? / And who shall declare unto him of these things?" (Luke 18:35). Here, Eliot uses this verse as a way to explain that it is impossible for people to live a perfect life or fulfill their desires in life. * The poem also contains many references from the Book of Revelation: "A thousand years these men know full well they shall not be; / And when shall these things be? and who shall declare unto him of these things?" (Rev 14:4-5). In this passage, Eliot draws a parallel between death and life by stating that people will live forever after their bodies die. * The poem also makes reference to the Book of Job in its opening lines ("He speaketh as one j ghting with God"): "The Waste Land" also uses the name "Job" for an unfortunate man who is stripped naked and whose house has been burned down (Eliot's version, like that found in Job 1:9-2:6). * The last section ("What the Thunder Said") makes reference to Isaiah 57:15 ("Thus saith the LORD unto his anointed whom he shall raise unto David His shewing unto Israel by Gentiles, and they that inhabited the cities thereof"). This verse is about a man who has been sent from God but cannot be saved. Eliot also refers to this in the lines: "This was not our first hope when we were young / In the beauty of the basket full of seeds." * The poem makes reference to Isaiah 40:31 ("Lo, I will fill  with good things; / I will cause the righteous to flourish as the grass"): "Thus says the LORD: when a man shall be in need, and his house was waste, then I will look on him." * The poem also contains many other allusions from the Book of Isaiah. In this passage ("And whosoever is not against us / Is for us"), Eliot references Isaiah 50:13-14: "I am come to do his will, and not to mine own" and "Not unto myself but unto you." * The poem contains many other Biblical quotations from various books of the Bible including the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Isaiah and Jonah. In addition, Eliot includes a list of references from scripture in his book "The Waste Land" (preface) that is used as an appendix in later editions to help with understanding some of the allusions he makes throughout the poem.

=== Classical === * The opening lines reference Horace's "Odes": "Shrove, before the feast / Of martyrdom and meed of fame". Eliot also uses this phrase in his essay "Tradition and the Individual Talent" ("Five poets are known to us by name") * The poem also makes reference to Homer's epic poem, the Iliad. In particular, it references the first lines of that work: "Sing sweeter than these / Of Cytherea and the Achaeans." (Iliad 1:1) * Eliot draws on Virgil in his final section ("What the Thunder Said"). The poem quotes from Book III of the Aeneid, lines 69-70 which read "Priamus / And a thousand other men. We did not know it then" (Aeneid 3:69-70). This is in reference to the deaths of Priam's sons and the Trojan women during the fall of Troy as told by Virgil. * The poem also contains allusions from other classical works like Ovid's "Metamorphoses" (referring to Scylla) and Hesiod's "Works and Days". Eliot makes references in his notes on "The Waste Land", preface, appendix, and the final section ("What the Thunder Said") as well. * The poem contains allusions from Sophocles' "Oedipus Rex" (e.g., lines 48-52) in which Oedipus says to himself: "This is not my home, not I myself" and then the next line reads "And now when all men / Are gone, I shall be alone." * The poem also makes reference from Horace's "Ars Poetica" (lines 102-103) which states: "To sing of love that is dead / Is more disgusting than to sing of hate". * Eliot refers to the classical Greek mythological figure Oedipus in his last section, when he writes: "We shall have to begin afresh. Who knows where?" The allusion makes reference to a line from Sophocles' "Oedipus Rex" ("To start all over again, as though I knew nothing"), which is written by Eliot himself at the end of his preface and notes in "The Waste Land". * Another classical work that influenced the poem was Lucian's satirical novel "A True Story", whose plot involves characters traveling to different planets. This allusion is found within lines 49-50: "...there are other places / And there will be others who say:/There never was such a fall." * The poem contains an extended quotation from Aristophanes' "Lysistrata" ("The riddle in the time of Plato"): "You don't know what you mean. That is why I am laughing at you." In this way, Eliot draws a parallel between Socrates and Lysistrata (the Athenian woman who persuades her fellow women to withhold sex from their husbands). * The poem contains an allusion to Aristophanes' "Clouds", in which the character of Socrates is depicted as teaching his students how to lie. This allusion can be found within lines 67-72: "...I will tell you a riddle; / Why should not one man rule many? And he who has power, why should he fear?"

=== Shakespeare === * The poem includes the line "Thus conscience does make cowards of us all", from "Hamlet", Act 3 Scene 1 ("This above all: to thine own self be true"). In addition, there is an extensive quotation in lines 96-108 from Shakespeare's play Henry IV Part II. * The poem makes a reference to Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet" (III.i), where Friar Lawrence says to Romeo: "Ay me, child, the world is nothing but grief; / Take my advice, act prudently." This quote can be found in lines 85-90 of Eliot's poem ("The dry cellar of a river / Where it falls among the reeds..."). * The final section ("What the Thunder Said") quotes from Shakespeare's "King Lear" (IV.vii) when Kent says to Gloucester: "No, no, my lord! I am old and foolish; / Your daughter is wise, but blind with love." This quotation can be found in lines 203-15 ("The white road winds down past a city..."). * The poem includes the line "'Tis strange how men forget all things" from Shakespeare's "Cymbeline" (IV.v), which is quoted by "the voice that says 'Listen All'". This quotation can be found in lines 162-4 ("The river winds and swells its way / Towards the sea..."). * The poem includes an allusion to Shakespeare's Writings: from "Henry IV Part II" (IV.i), when Falstaff says "And I had rather hear my dog bark at a crow than know happiness." This quotation can be found in lines 123-4 ("The river winds and swells its way / Towards the sea..."). * The poem quotes from Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet" (III.ii) when Romeo says to himself, "Parting is such sweet sorrow" which can be found in lines 107-8 ("The river winds and swells its way / Towards the sea..."). * The poem also contains a reference from "Romeo and Juliet" (II.ii) when Romeo says to himself: "Wherefore did I ever deign to be my own?". This quotation can be found in lines 167-8 ("This is not the place / To say what we mean, but it would have been well / If that which was said had been unsaid"). * The poem also contains an allusion from Shakespeare's "Macbeth" (IV.ii) when Lady Macbeth says to herself: "When shall we three meet again? In thunder, lightning, or in rain?" This quotation can be found within lines 209-13 ("The white road winds down past a city..."). * The poem also includes an allusion from "Romeo and Juliet" (II.iii) when Romeo says to himself: "What if this thing cease? And die by the side of Juliet." This quotation can be found within lines 236-7 ("The white road winds down past a city..."). * The poem contains an allusion from "Romeo and Juliet" (III.i) when Mercutio says: "Ask for me tomorrow, and you shall find me a grave man." This quotation can be found within lines 246-7 ("The white road winds down past a city..."). * The poem also contains an allusion from Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet" (I.v), when Romeo says: "Did my heart love till now? Forswear it, sight! / And learn me to pity, or chiefly I ne'er shall see thee more."
