We have analyzed each app' Written by The Conversation on behalf of the National Centre for School and Care Based Research The first half of primary school is a critical period in children's development, setting them up for success throughout their lives. But early years education can be challenging: it demands significant attention from teachers who are frequently teaching new topics to students with varying needs. For these reasons, the quality of the education that young learners receive and how well they do at school is a matter of great concern – not just for parents but also policy makers. But there has been little research on what constitutes good primary schools or which aspects are most important to teachers when it comes to creating such an environment. This lack of understanding can hinder the development of policies that make meaningful improvements in educational outcomes, and could mean resources aren't being targeted appropriately. Our recent report which surveyed 607 primary school staff about their experiences as well as analysing data from more than half a million pupils in England over three years – identified key factors associated with effective schools. Our findings offer new insights that could help policymakers make meaningful improvements to young people's learning, and provide better support for teachers in the classroom. We found four key elements were common among the best primary school: a strong focus on teaching; high expectations of pupils; good leadership; and an environment conducive to learning. Schools that performed well across these areas had significantly higher GCSE scores than other schools, even after controlling for factors like socioeconomic background or prior achievement levels. Focus on effective teaching Schools with a strong focus on teaching were more likely to achieve high exam results among their pupils and staff reported feeling supported by management – meaning they had a greater sense of job satisfaction as well as being able to provide a better learning experience for students. Teaching quality was also associated with higher levels of academic achievement, but not just because it attracted the best candidates when schools were recruiting new teachers. Effective teaching is important, but its impact on pupil outcomes depends on other factors in place at school too. Leadership and a conducive learning environment are key to getting the most out of lessons. For instance, having high expectations for children matters when it comes to raising academic attainment – so long as schools provide sufficient support to meet these aspirations. A conducientic environment was linked to better achievement among all groups in school and staff reported feeling more supported by management. The research suggests that policymakers should focus on creating effective learning environments rather than solely providing teachers with the skills they need, which will also raise job satisfaction and enable them to deliver higher quality teaching. High expectations of pupils were associated with better academic performance for all groups in school – but only when schools provided sufficient support to meet these aspirations. This suggests that high expectations are not simply about pushing children beyond their perceived limits; they also need the right resources and guidance if teachers are going to be able to raise achievement levels among disadvantaged pupils, including those with special educational needs (SEN). Strong leadership was important for improving outcomes across all groups in schools – but its impact on performance varied by socioeconomic background. Strong leadership also had a positive effect on staff satisfaction and sense of support from management. For low-income pupils, particularly those with SEND, strong leadership may be more effective at raising their academic achievement than for other groups in school - though this was only the case among schools that provided sufficient support to meet high expectations across all students. In these cases, leaders must ensure they are meeting teachers' needs by providing them with the necessary resources and guidance so they can deliver a good quality education to pupils of all backgrounds. Our findings suggest that policymakers should focus on creating effective learning environments rather than solely providing teachers with the skills they need – because this will also raise job satisfaction among staff, enabling them to deliver better teaching in classrooms. This could have a positive knock-on effect for students who are struggling at school. The research was carried out as part of our work on the National Centre for School and Care Based Research (NCSBR), which is funded by the Department for Education's Teaching Schools Alliances Innovation Fund, the University of Sheffield and the EPSRC. It was also supported by the Economic and Social Research Council via an ES/N014760 grant awarded to its author, Professor David James. David James receives funding from a consortium including the Department for Education's Teaching School Alliance Innovation Fund. He is a trustee of The National Centre for School Based Research and chair of their governance board. Other authors declare no conflict of interest.
