En el calor sofocante de la tarde, los niños se divierten en el canal que serpentea a través del pueblo, mientras que los ancianos los miran desde las sillas de balanceo en las porches de sus casas soleadas. Mariposas saltan de cada arbusto, a veces flotando juntas en kaleidoscopios.

El mundo ficticio de Macondo, creado por Gabriel García Márquez en su novela "Cien Años de Soledad", cobra vida en una pequeña ciudad colombiana.

Aracataca, a coastal city in Colombia with a population of 40,000 inhabitants, could have continued to be like any other city in the coastal region of the country - hot, dusty, poor and unknown to the outside world - if not for the inspiration that led to the author's fantastical scenario in his novel "One Hundred Years of Solitude".

García Márquez was born in Aracataca and lived there until he was eight years old with his maternal grandparents. The author, known in Colombia as Gabo, later said that all his writing was based on that time, none more so than the book that came to symbolize magical realism. By blending the fantastical with the everyday to show the comic, absurd and often tragic aspects of life in Latin America, Gabo gave voice to the region and won hearts all over the world.

Now, the locals hope that a Netflix adaptation of "One Hundred Years of Solitude" will a Aracataca en lo que es Dublín para James Joyce o Stratford upon Avon para Shakespeare. Los primeros ocho de 16 episodios se esperan a finales de este año en lo que podría convertirse en una de las producciones de televisión más caras de la historia de América Latina.

Sin embargo, no todos en Aracataca están convencidos de que Macondo pueda ser traducido de la página a la pantalla, incluso con un presupuesto de Netflix. La novela tiene poca narración, incluye múltiples personajes con el mismo nombre y su cronología salta hacia adelante y hacia atrás.

A pesar de las dudas, los residentes de Aracataca se enorgullecen de la conexión con la novela y esperan que inspire a más personas a visitar la ciudad. "Cualquiera inspirado por la serie tendrá que venir a Aracataca, ya que el corazón de Macondo late aquí," dijo Robinson Mulford, un maestro de secundaria local.
