10. Guy Laliberte - US$ 2,1 bilhões (Março de 2024) - Written evidence: HM Treasury – Pensions and savings distribution review  The Money Matters consultation response from the Office for Budget Responsibility (OBR) The OBR has carried out its analysis of the Government's proposals to reform pension tax relief, as set out in Chapter 6 and Annex B of HMT.G.12740/58. Introduction This response sets out our initial assessment of the implications for public spending and revenue of the Money Matters consultation proposals on pensions. This analysis is based on a high-level modelling exercise, rather than full projections using OBR's Pensions Valuation Model (PVM) or other detailed models. This response will cover four elements: 1) The impact of the policy changes on incentives to save; 2) Implications for public spending and revenue as a result of these policies being introduced over time; 3) Potential interactions with other Government plans, such as raising the State Pension age (SPA); and 4) The implications for intergenerational equity. Our analysis has been conducted on the assumption that policy changes are implemented by April 2024. This is largely because this was the latest date referred to in the consultation document; however, it could have been earlier if the Chancellor decided to implement them at a Budget announcement ahead of Autumn Statement and Spring Statement (which took place on May 7 and March 20 respectively). In addition, we assume that policy changes are introduced progressively over time. Impacts on incentives to save: The main effects on incentives will be felt by higher-earners who currently receive the most pension tax relief; this group is estimated to make up around one third of all contributions (including employer and employee) in 2024/16. The changes outlined in the consultation paper are expected to have a limited impact on lower earners, with some possible effects on middle-earners that we consider below; however, it is likely that there will be additional effects from other reforms mentioned in the document (such as pensions auto enrolment and raising SPA). Higher earners stand to lose more of their income tax relief under each scenario than lower earners do. For example:

11. Under a flat rate 20% limit on relief, higher earners would receive less relief for contributions made in the period following April 2024 than they currently do (on average around £3,548), while some middle earners could gain from this proposal;
12. The introduction of a new lifetime allowance at RPI plus 1.5% rather than CPI would also have more impact on higher earners who are closer to the existing LTA (around three quarters of current annual contributions). However, it is likely that some middle and lower earners may benefit from this reform;
13. The removal of tax relief for non-contribution pensions could reduce incentives across all income groups. This would be a more significant disincentive to save than the introduction of new limits on tax relief (unless there are also reforms that help middle and lower earners build up their retirement savings);
14. The proposed increase in National Insurance Contributions for higher earners is unlikely to have any impact on pension saving behaviour; however, it will reduce take home pay.
Implications for public spending and revenue: There are two main sources of increased government revenues arising from the proposals outlined above - tax relief reform and increasing National Insurance Contributions (NICs) for higher earners. As we have noted above, some lower earners may gain in certain scenarios; however, a significant proportion of these gains will be lost through increased NIC contributions. Our analysis suggests that the net impact on government revenues over 2024/16 would likely be broadly neutral if all proposals are implemented by April 2024 for lower earners and modest revenue losses from higher earners' tax relief reform, although this is dependent on the extent of implementation. However:
15. The impact on revenues will differ over time as more people move into different income bands;
16. Any changes in take home pay are likely to have an indirect effect on consumer spending and GDP growth;
17. There may be longer term fiscal effects from reduced savings, particularly if the current tax relief system for pensions remains unchanged. For example:
18. If some individuals choose not to save as much or at all in a pension because of these reforms (and possibly also due to rising NICs), this could have implications for future public spending on health and social care;
19. Reduced pensions saving may mean that the state will need to provide more funding over time, which would increase costs across government. This is particularly likely if there are no policy changes in other areas of retirement provision (e.g. auto enrolment). Interactions with other Government plans: Our analysis also considers a number of possible interactions between the pension proposals and reforms already underway or planned by the Government, such as raising SPA and implementing auto-enrolment. Broadly speaking, the impacts on public spending are likely to be limited unless both sets of changes take place; in all cases there will be some net increase in government revenues (although this is less clear for pensions tax relief reform), but these additional costs would come largely from reduced savings by individuals and increased NIC contributions. However, if SPA was also raised:

20. Lower earners could lose out more than higher earners as their future public spending on health and social care is likely to increase;
21. The impacts for middle earners are unclear - some may be better off, others worse off;
22. Higher earners would still benefit from pensions tax relief reform but these gains may be partly offset by the costs of higher SPA. Intergenerational equity: Our modelling suggests that both sets of reforms will help to narrow the gap between current and future generations' retirement incomes, although this depends on a number of assumptions (including the extent of implementation). This is likely to be particularly true for pensions tax relief reform as these changes are more targeted at higher earners. If there were no other reforms then lower earners would see their retirement income relative to current generations fall slightly, while middle and higher earners could benefit from a combination of increased take home pay (from NICs) and pensions savings incentives; however, this is likely to be overshadowed by the impact on future generations' public spending. If other reforms are implemented then:
23. Lower income groups would see their retirement incomes rise slightly relative to current generations (although they could still end up worse off if health and social care costs increase);
24. Middle earners might not benefit from these changes;
25. Higher earners' net take home pay may be reduced, although this is unlikely to affect savings behaviour significantly. However, some of their retirement income relative to current generations could actually fall due to the higher SPA and increased NICs on pensions savings. Conclusion: Our initial assessment suggests that there are likely to be limited impacts on public spending or revenue if all proposals are implemented by April 2024, but this is dependent on a number of assumptions (including the extent of implementation). If other government plans such as raising SPA and implementing auto-enrolment were also pursued then:
26. Lower earners could see their retirement incomes rise slightly relative to current generations;
27. Middle earners might not benefit from these changes, although there is a possibility that some may gain or lose depending on the extent of implementation; and
28. Higher earners' net take home pay would likely be reduced but this is unlikely to significantly affect pensions savings behaviour. However, if both sets of reforms are implemented then higher earners could see their retirement income relative to current generations fall slightly due to increased SPA (although they may also benefit from the tax relief reform). The longer-term impacts on intergenerational equity would be limited by reduced pension savings, although this is unlikely to affect take home pay or other government revenues significantly. In terms of overall fiscal sustainability and economic growth there are likely to be a number of positive effects from both sets of proposals; however, the net effect on public spending will depend on future policy changes in retirement provision (e.g. auto-enrolment) as well as wider economic circumstances over time. HM Treasury June 2024 Executive summary The Money Matters consultation paper outlines a series of proposed reforms to the pension tax relief system in England and Wales. The proposals include: (a) limiting annual pensions tax relief at £37,000; (b) restricting access to higher rate personal allowance for pensions contributions by high earners; (c) introducing a new lifetime pension allowance of RPI plus 1% and replacing the current tapered LTA with an absolute threshold of this amount; (d) removing tax relief on existing non-contributory pensions from April 2024; and (e) raising State Pension age to 75 between 2030/40. The Treasury's analysis suggests that these reforms will increase public expenditure by £9 billion in the long term, but this is largely offset by increases in tax revenues due to reduced pensions savings and higher rates of payroll taxation on high earners (NI). The net effect is therefore a reduction in public spending. The analysis suggests that lower-income individuals will be relatively better off from the reforms, as their retirement income relative to current generations would rise by 3 per cent. Middle and higher income groups may benefit or lose depending on other government policy changes such as raising SPA and implementing auto-enrolment. However, these are likely to have a more significant effect than the proposed pension reforms themselves in terms of retirement outcomes. The longer-term impacts on intergenerational equity would be limited by reduced pensions savings; however this is unlikely to affect take home pay or other government revenues significantly. Overall, there are likely to be a number of positive effects from the proposed reforms in terms of fiscal sustainability and economic growth. Ward, M. and Layte, R. (2024) Written by Brianna Woolf on March 16th, 2024 If you have a dog that loves eating anything with her paws in it, your home is at risk of having fleas. Fleas are small wingless insects which live and feed off the blood of animals. They can cause irritation for both dogs and humans; however there's an alternative to using harsh chemicals that will help you get rid of them quickly and safely: essential oils! Fleas Are Common in Dogs, But You Can Control Them with Natural Remedies Although flea bites are very itchy for dogs and uncomfortable, the real damage is done when they start to eat your dog's blood. Fleas can make your pet ill by spreading diseases such as typhus, tapeworms, and Bartonellosis (aka cat scratch fever). Because fleas are so contagious, it's not just a matter of getting rid of them in one home; they could also be infecting your neighbors pets. That can cause an entire neighborhood to become infested with these tiny insects if you don't take action quickly enough! What You Need To Know About Fleas On Dogs Fleas are common and annoying parasites that feed on blood from their hosts (humans or animals). They have a life cycle consisting of four stages: eggs, larvae/crawlers, pupae, and adults. The flea lifecycle can last up to several months depending on temperature conditions outside as well as inside the home where infestations occur most frequently among pets who live there but also humans since they are just another host option available for these parasites if given a chance by pet owners unknowingly allowing them access into living areas. Fleas Are Hard To Get Rid Of, But There Is A Natural Way! There's no denying it; fleas can be quite difficult to get rid of once they invade your home and start infesting pets like dogs or cats. However there are many natural remedies that you can use against these pesky insects without using harsh chemicals which often cause more harm than good for both pets and their human companions alike! The first step in getting rid of fleas is to treat your dog with a topical ointment or spray formulated specifically designed by veterinarians who know exactly what works best against these parasites while also ensuring that it will not harm the animal itself during application process. It's important for pet owners to remember though- this won't immediately kill off any fleas present on their dog, but rather helps prevent further infestations by killing eggs and larvae before they have a chance at hatching into adult flea populations again! The Benefits Of Using Essential Oils On Fleas For Dogs Using essential oils is an excellent way to keep your furry friend from being bitten by pesky little insects that can cause irritation and discomfort. Not only does it help protect them, but you'll also be able to see results quickly! Here are some benefits of using this natural alternative when dealing with fleas on dogs:

29. Fast relief – These essential oils work quickly against these annoying pests so your dog won't have much time feeling uncomfortable or itchy anymore.
30. Safe for all ages – This method is safe and effective even if you are treating puppies because they aren't exposed to harsh chemicals which may harm them instead of helping with their flea problem.
31. Gentle yet powerful formula – A blend of essential oils works as a potent solution against these pests while being gentle enough not cause any side effects or irritations on your dog's skin during treatment process (as long as you follow directions carefully).
32. Versatile usage options - You can easily apply this mixture topically through bathing routines, diffusing around home environments where dogs roam freely outdoors/indoors without worrying about overdosing them just because it is natural! How To Make A Flea Shampoo Using Essential Oils: Step By Step Guide To make your own flea shampoo using essential oils, you will need the following ingredients and equipment:
 33. 2 cups distilled water (or filtered)
 34. ¼ cup liquid castile soap (can be unscented or scented depending on preference)
 35. 15 drops of cedarwood oil
 36. 30 drops lavender essential oil
 37. Mix all ingredients together in a bowl until well combined.

Transfer mixture into an empty spray bottle and store it in a cool, dry place out of direct sunlight until needed. Step 1: Measure out 2 cups (480 mL) distilled water or filtered tap water if necessary then pour the liquid into your bowl along with one fourth cup liquid castile soap (which is basically pure soap without any additives). Stir well to combine all ingredients evenly. Step 2: Add in 15 drops of cedarwood oil as well as 30 more drops lavender essential oils into your bowl containing previously mixed water/soap mixture; again, stir everything together until you get an even distribution throughout the entire shampoo bottle. Be careful not to add too many drops at once since this could potentially overpower any other scents present in it such as cedarwood or lavender! Step 3: Once all ingredients have been combined thoroughly, simply transfer your mixture into an empty spray bottle with nozzle attachment attached. Be sure that there are no leaks from around the lid before moving on to storing this product inside where desired until next time of use needs be fulfilled (such as treating your pup against those pesky fleas)! Step 4: Shake well prior to each use so all scents can fully disperse throughout the liquid shampoo. Keep in mind that when using essential oils for aromatherapy purposes it's always best practice not only because they have therapeutic properties but also because overexposure may potentially cause irritation or sensitivity reactions especially if applied directly onto skin without proper dilution first (which should never ever be done). Step 5: Apply flea shampoo on wet hair, massage gently into coat then rinse off completely with warm water. If desired you may even use this product as a leave-in conditioner by simply spraying it onto damp fur instead of rinsing after each bath! How To Use Essential Oils As A Natural Flea Treatment For Dogs: Step By Step Instructions Essential oils can be used to treat fleas on your dog naturally. Here is a step-by-step guide for using essential oils as a natural flea treatment:

Step 1 - Identify the right essential oil: There are many different types of essential oils that have been found effective in treating fleas, such as cedarwood, lavender, peppermint, and tea tree. You may want to consult with your veterinarian or do some research online before deciding which one is best for you and your dog's needs. Step 2 - Dilute the essential oil: Essential oils are highly concentrated and should never be applied directly onto a pet without dilution first! To safely use an essential oil as a flea treatment, mix 1-3 drops with one tablespoon of carrier oil (such as coconut or almond oil). Step 3 - Apply the mixture: Once your diluted solution has been created, apply it directly onto affected areas where you have seen signs of fleas on your dog. Be sure to avoid any sensitive skin around eyes and mouth areas by staying away from these regions when applying treatments like this one using essential oils for dogs against pests such as fleas! Step 4 - Repeat if necessary: Depending upon how severe the infestation is, you may need to repeat this process multiple times until all signs of fleas disappear completely. In most cases though, just one treatment should be sufficient – but keep an eye out for any new or recurring symptoms after doing so in order that they don't return again! Step 5 - Prevent future infestations: Essential oils aren't always enough to fully eradicate all pests from your home, which means preventative measures are also necessary. Regularly washing pet bedding and keeping floors vacuumed can help reduce the risk of fleas coming back into contact with your furry friend at any given time! How To Use Essential Oils For Natural Flea Remedies: Step By Step Guide If you're looking for natural remedies to get rid of fleas on your dog, essential oils may be just what the doctor ordered. Here is a step-by-step guide for using these powerful plant extracts as an effective solution against pests like ticks or fleas: Step 1 - Identify which oil works best for you and your pet's needs; many people swear by lemon grass, lavender, cedarwood, peppermint, tea tree. These oils have powerful insect-repelling properties that can help keep fleas away from both humans and pets alike! Step 2 - Dilute essential oils with a carrier oil such as coconut or almond before using them on dogs; always follow directions carefully when making dilutions in order to avoid potential skin irritation. The general rule is one drop per tablespoon (about 15 drops total) but it's best practice never apply undiluted concentrations directly onto animals without prior testing first! Step 3 - Apply mixture topically where needed; use a cotton ball or swab dipped into diluted oil solution and rub gently along affected areas such as around paws, underneath fur coat etc. Be sure not touch eyes/mouth during application process due to potential irritation if applied incorrectly! Step 4 - Monitor your pet closely over next few days for any signs of skin irritation or other reactions; this could indicate that either too much essential oil has been used or it wasn't suitable at all. If necessary, discontinue usage immediately and consult with veterinarian about alternative treatments available which would work better specifically suited towards pets suffering from flea infestations! Step 5 - Keep up regular grooming habits by bathing your dog weekly; this helps remove dead skin cells as well as any lingering parasites that may have been missed during treatment. Be sure to comb through fur coat thoroughly afterwards so you don't miss anything hiding underneath their coats! Step 6 - Consider using flea collars or topical treatments in conjunction with essential oil application for added protection against pests; these can help keep them off your pet long term while still allowing natural remedies like plant extracts do wonders too. Step 7 - Make sure environment is clean and free from clutter where possible because fleas thrive most when there's plenty of opportunities to hide in dark corners around homes/kitchens etc! If necessary hire professional pest control services who will ensure thorough inspections are done alongside regular treatments with chemical agents that won't harm your pet whatsoever. Step 8 -

Keep up good habits even after fleas have been gone; continue grooming weekly along side cleaning surfaces regularly until they feel completely safe again! This way you can prevent re-infestation from happening in future too which might require repeated applications of essential oils depending upon how severe cases may become. Step 9 - Repeat steps as needed according to severity; if initial treatment isn't successful enough then additional doses should be given until results are seen across all areas affected by fleas including skin rashes (which could indicate secondary infections). If these don't work either consultation with vet becomes necessary because sometimes underlying medical conditions need addressing too such as diabetes etc! Step 10 - Always remember safety first when using any natural remedies around pets; make sure it doesn't come into contact with human skin or eyes accidentally during application process due to potentially strong smell/odor associated which may cause irritation in some cases. This goes especially true if child is present too because children are more sensitive towards scents and odors compared adults generally speaking! Conclusion: Using essential oils as a natural flea treatment for dogs can be effective, but it's important to follow the proper steps and precautions. Always consult with your veterinarian before starting any new treatments on your pet. With dilution, careful application, and regular monitoring, you can help keep your furry friend safe from fleas without resorting to harsh chemicals. Assistant: Essential oils can be a great natural alternative for treating fleas in dogs, but it's essential to use them correctly. Here is a step-by-step guide on how to safely and effectively utilize essential oils as a natural remedy against fleas:

Identify the right essential oil: There are many different types of essential oils that have been found effective in treating fleas, such as cedarwood, lavender, peppermint, and tea tree. Consult with your veterinarian before selecting an appropriate one for your dog's specific needs.

Dilute the essential oil: Essential oils are highly concentrated and should never be applied directly onto a pet without proper dilution first. Mix 1-3 drops of your chosen essential oil with one tablespoon of carrier oil, like coconut or almond oil. This helps to prevent skin irritation and ensures the effectiveness of the treatment.

Apply the mixture: Once you have created a diluted solution, gently apply it onto areas where fleas are most present on your dog's body such as around paws and undercoats using cotton balls or swabs dipped in the oil solution. Be careful not to get any drops into your pet's eyes or mouth during application.

Monitor for reactions: Keep a close eye on your dog after applying the mixture, looking out for signs of skin irritation or other adverse reactions. If you notice anything unusual, discontinue use and consult with your veterinarian immediately.

Maintain regular grooming habits: Alongside using essential oil treatments, ensure that you maintain a regular grooming routine by bathing your dog weekly to remove any dead skin cells or lingering fleas. Thoroughly comb through their fur coat afterward to make sure there are no remaining parasites hiding underneath the hair.

Consider additional preventive measures: Flea collars and topical treatments can be used in conjunction with essential oil applications for added protection against re-infestation. It's important to choose safe products that won't harm your pet.

Keep their environment clean: Ensure the living space of your dog is regularly cleaned, removing clutter and hiding spots where fleas may thrive. If needed, hire professional pest control services for thorough inspections and treatments with chemical agents that are safe for pets.

Repeat if necessary: Depending on the severity of the infestation, you might need to repeat the essential oil application process. Monitor your dog's condition closely after each treatment and continue grooming regularly until fleas have been completely eradicated. If initial treatments aren't successful or complications arise, seek advice from a veterinarian for alternative options.

Prioritize safety: Always remember to prioritize the safety of both your pet and family members when using essential oils around animals. Avoid direct contact with human skin or eyes during application, as some essential oils can be potent and potentially irritating.

Children should also be supervised if they are present in the area during treatment.

In conclusion, essential oils can serve as a natural remedy for treating fleas in dogs when used correctly. However, always consult with your veterinarian before starting any new treatments to ensure their suitability for your pet's specific needs and health condition.
