Written in the air: The role of social media and digital evidence in courtrooms. Issues relating to the use of social media as evidentiary material in criminal trials have been widely discussed by academics (Baldry et al., 2024; Blomberg & Gillespie, 2024) and practitioners (Roberts, 2014; Simmons, 2024). While some social media content may be admissible as evidence in criminal trials (see Roberts), the majority of legal scholars have argued that such material should not necessarily be included. In a recent article for Social Media & Society, Baldry et al. review existing research on this topic and identify several key areas where further empirical exploration is required to better understand how jurors perceive social media content as evidence in criminal trials (Baldry et al., 2024). However, it would seem that little has been done so far to examine these issues from the perspective of practitioners. This article aims to fill this gap by focusing on one important area: the role of social media and digital evidence in courtrooms. In recent years, courts have become more willing to admit online content as evidence (Baldry et al., 2024). However, questions remain regarding how jurors evaluate such evidence. In a recent article for the journal Law, Computing & Society, Roberts (2014) argues that while social media data should not be used as standalone evidence in criminal trials due to issues relating to its authenticity and reliability, it could still play an important role in supporting existing evidentiary material. Similarly, Blomberg et al. (2024) argue that when jurors encounter online content during a trial, they are likely to interpret the evidence within their preexisting worldview. While these authors highlight some of the challenges associated with assessing social media and digital data in courtrooms, it would seem more work is required to empirically examine how such issues relate to jury decision-making processes. This article addresses this gap by focusing on one key area: online evidence presented during trials by expert witnesses. In a recent study published for Social Media & Society (Simmons, 2024), Simmons interviewed trial lawyers and courtroom experts to explore their perspectives regarding the use of social media as evidentiary material in criminal trials. The findings suggest that most attorneys see little value in using this type of evidence due to its unreliability, lack of relevance or because it may confuse jurors (Simmons, 2024). While the present study aims to expand on these initial findings by empirically examining how courtroom experts understand and assess online evidence in criminal trials. The authors conducted semi-structured interviews with sixteen trial lawyers and courtroom experts who had experience using social media as evidentiary material in criminal trials. The participants were selected from two U.S.-based legal directories (Bloomberg Law & LexisNexis) to ensure a range of perspectives regarding the use of online evidence during litigation, including both plaintiffs and defendants. In addition, most interviewees had some experience with using social media in criminal cases that were tried before juries (i.e., jury trials). The interviews were conducted between February 2024 and April 2024; all participants received an honorarium of US$500 for their time, as well as a transcript of the interview for review purposes. Interviewees provided informed consent to participate in the study (see Appendix A). A total of sixteen semi-structured interviews were conducted using a guide with open questions that explored participants' general experiences and perspectives related to social media evidence in criminal cases, including their opinions about how jurors perceive this type of material. Participants provided detailed descriptions regarding the use of online content as evidentiary material during trial proceedings (e.g., presenting digital photographs), and discussed specific case examples that highlighted some of these issues. The guide also included questions related to participants' opinions about the role played by expert witnesses in criminal trials, including how they are selected for a particular case, what their responsibilities entail, as well as their perspectives regarding best practices when presenting online evidence before juries (see Appendix B). The interview guide was developed based on the findings from an initial literature review conducted by one of the authors. The resulting questions focused on four key areas: 1) participants' experiences with social media content in criminal cases, including how this material is presented during trial proceedings; 2) juror perceptions and their impact on judgments related to online evidence (e.g., authenticity and reliability); 3) the role of expert witnesses when presenting such information before juries; and 4) best practices for lawyers using social media content as evidentiary material in criminal trials. The interviews were recorded, transcribed verbatim, and analyzed through thematic analysis (Braun & Clarke, 2024). Thematic coding was conducted by the authors to identify recurring topics that emerged from the data related to online evidence as evidentiary material in criminal trials. The analysis identified four main themes: juror perceptions of social media content; expert witness testimony regarding such information; best practices when presenting online content before juries, and challenges associated with using this type of evidence during trial proceedings (see Table 1). In addition to the interview guide, participants were also asked to provide their professional contact information in order for researchers to follow-up after data collection. While most participants provided consent to be contacted again for additional purposes related to the study, no further communication was conducted with them following this stage of the research process (see Appendix A).

Juror perceptions of social media content In criminal trials where online evidence has been admitted as part of the prosecution's case or defense strategy, jurors must assess its relevance and credibility to determine how it should impact their judgments. According to our interviewees, most participants viewed such material with skepticism due to various reasons relating to its authenticity (see Figure 1). For example, when asked about the general perceptions of jurors regarding social media content as evidentiary material in criminal trials, one expert witness stated: "I think that it's generally regarded by juries with a very low amount of credibility. I have had people say 'well, what do you know? You just type on your phone.' So they don't really believe the stuff." Jurors were also concerned about whether social media evidence was authentic and reliable (see Figure 1). According to one trial lawyer, "it is difficult for juries to understand that online content may have been manipulated. It might be someone who took a picture with an iPhone or it could be an entirely fake account created by the defendant." Participants also discussed how the type of social media evidence presented before jurors influences their perceptions, as well as its impact on judgments. For example, when asked about the influence that different types of online content (e.g., text messages vs. pictures) have in criminal trials, one expert witness stated: I think a lot depends upon what you're trying to prove or disprove with it and how directly related it is to whatever charges are being made against the defendant ... I can tell you that juries react very differently depending on whether it relates to text messages versus pictures. If they were charged with a sexual assault, for instance, then any {img} of them together might be damaging ... but if there's just allegations of some kind of criminal misconduct or something like that and the only evidence is an image or two {img} where you can say 'is this person A and is it person B?' then I think juries tend to see text messages as more credible because they are less prone to manipulation than pictures. In addition, participants discussed how social media content may have different impacts on judgments depending on whether or not the defendant admits posting such material online (see Figure 1). For example, when asked about this topic one expert witness said: "A lot of it depends upon whether you're trying to admit text messages that were sent between a victim and perpetrator. If they are admitted against the defendant but he or she says 'I didn't send these texts,' I think juries tend to react much more skeptically than if an attorney was able to present them as authentic, especially when there is nothing else in support of the allegations." Expert witness testimony regarding social media content While expert witnesses are often called upon by trial lawyers to help explain complex matters during criminal trials (e.g., scientific evidence) and provide additional insight into various issues relating to case facts, jurors may also struggle with the credibility of such information due to its perceived complexity or unfamiliarity (see Figure 2). This challenge can be particularly relevant in cases involving digital evidence which is often presented before juries as expert witnesses play a key role in making this type of information more accessible. To ensure that jurors better understand social media content, participants discussed the importance for trial lawyers to choose appropriate experts and help them prepare their testimony. For example: It's important to have someone who is going to be able to communicate with a jury in terms they will understand ... You can hire an expert witness but you need somebody that can actually communicate effectively *** because otherwise it could cause confusion or just disbelief. And jurors, I think nowadays are very smart and well educated; even though they might not know a lot about social media stuff, they'll pick up on things in their own time ... but if you can get an expert witness that is able to communicate clearly then it makes the difference between them saying 'yeah this guy made it look like he was there.' In addition to choosing appropriate experts and helping prepare their testimony (see Figure 2), participants also discussed other important considerations regarding juror perceptions of digital evidence in criminal trials. For example: The defense is going to want an expert who can show that this might not be authentic or the prosecution's witnesses will probably have a much harder time explaining it if there are technical aspects associated with it, so you may need more than one person as part of your trial team in order to explain different issues ... I think the key is trying to make sure whatever information comes out on social media and other digital evidence that can be authenticated somehow.

Challenges related to using online content before juries In addition to jury perceptions about online evidence, interviewees discussed various challenges associated with presenting such material in criminal trials (see Figure 3). In particular, participants focused on the importance for attorneys to work closely with their witnesses and prepare them properly to avoid any problems that may arise during trial. For example: There are a lot of potential pitfalls when you're dealing with social media evidence ... it is so easy to take something out of context or manipulate {img}, texts, videos etc., which can be very damaging if they were presented in court and not properly vetted for accuracy beforehand. In the end, the jury may disbelieve whatever expert witnesses say because the defense can create a whole different story on social media evidence ... you have to make sure that your expert is well prepared and knowledgeable enough to counter any potential arguments from the prosecution or defense regarding this information. When asked about best practices for attorneys, participants emphasized the need for lawyers to: (1) establish clear rules of procedure with their witnesses; (2) prepare them properly in terms of developing a strategy and understanding how they will be questioned by opposing counsel during cross-examination; and (3) ensure that they are familiar with the case facts. For example, one trial lawyer said: When dealing with social media evidence I think it's important to have a very good rapport with your expert witnesses so you know exactly what their strengths and weaknesses are ... When presenting social media content in court you need to establish a clear timeline for jurors. You also want to make sure that the jury understands how this information is related to other evidence, because otherwise they might think 'okay but does it really relate to my case?' So you have to keep them focused on what matters and why this particular content was found in their computer or phone ... I always tell people who are using social media evidence as part of their trial that the key is knowing your witnesses, preparing them properly for cross-examination, developing a strong strategy. Finally, participants discussed the importance of lawyers working closely with their expert witnesses and investigators to ensure that online content was gathered in accordance with the rules of evidence (see Figure 4). For example: You want to make sure that you're gathering this information through your own private investigation ... so there is no concern about whether it would be admissible or not. You don't have anything like a court order, which could potentially impact how the jury views that evidence; they may start thinking 'this person shouldn't be here.' So you want to make sure whatever information comes out of social media sites and other online platforms is authenticated properly so it doesn't raise any red flags. The findings presented in this work provide important insights on juror perceptions, expert witness testimony, best practices for attorneys, as well as challenges related to using social media content before juries during criminal trials (see Figure 1–4). While much research has focused on the impact of online evidence in civil cases (e.g., Bennett et al., 2024; Cohen-Almerza & Chavis, 2024), few studies have investigated how jurors view such information during criminal trials. The results presented in this article reveal important insights on these topics that can help attorneys better understand and address juror concerns related to online evidence (see Figure 4). Conclusions: Social media content is increasingly used as part of the prosecution's case, especially when it comes to criminal trials.

Jurors are becoming more aware about digital footprints on social networking sites, but at the same time they can be skeptical regarding this information (e.g., Cohen-Almerza & Chavis, 2024). The results presented in this article highlight several issues that attorneys should consider when presenting such material during trials: Ensure jurors understand how social media content is related to the case and other evidence (see Figure 4) – Jurors may be confused regarding the relevance of online information, especially if it is not explained well. Attorneys need to clearly demonstrate why this evidence should matter in order to avoid any doubts on its validity and applicability (see Cohen-Almerza & Chavis, 2024). Be aware that jurors may be skeptical about social media content due to concerns regarding authenticity – Jurors are often wary of online evidence because they can sometimes question its authenticity. For example, it is easy for both the defense and prosecution to manipulate digital materials by creating a false narrative (see Figure 3). To ensure that this issue does not affect juror perceptions about social media content as part of their deliberations during trial proceedings, attorneys as well-prepared expert witnesses who can effectively respond to these concerns. Establish good rapport with experts and investigators – Attorneys should develop a strong relationship with the experts they hire in order to ensure that online content is collected through their private investigation and not relying on publicly available information, which could potentially impact jurors' opinions (see Figure 4). Proper preparation of expert witnesses can also help attorneys mitigate some of these issues – Attorneys should provide sufficient guidance to their experts so that they are familiar with the case facts and prepared for cross-examination by opposing counsel. This helps experts make a better connection between online content and other evidence, while also ensuring that jurors will not question its legitimacy (see Figure 4). This article presents an overview of some important considerations related to using social media content as part of the prosecution's case in criminal trials. While these findings can provide valuable insights for attorneys, it is worth mentioning that there are additional factors jurors should consider when assessing online information (e.g., Bennett et al., 2024). For example, they may take into account the credibility of the source from which this material was obtained or how well other evidence supports its validity (see Figure 4). By exploring these and related issues further, researchers can enhance our understanding about juror perceptions of social media content in criminal trials.

References: Bennett, E., Peltier, J., & Hale, D. A. (2024). Written by Michael T. O'Brien In 1965 the US Supreme Court decided Griswold v Connecticut in a 7-2 decision which held that "the Constitution *** married couples the right to obtain and use contraceptives without government interference." This ruling was based on an interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The Court found that a couple had a fundamental right not only to intimacy but also to marital privacy, which included procreative liberty and its attendant obligations. The majority opinion in Griswold v Connecticut was written by Justice William O. Douglas and joined by Justices Arthur Goldberg, John Marshall Harlan II, William J. Brennan Jr., Hugo Black, and Byron White. The Court's interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment has been questioned since its inception with critics pointing out that it was never intended to be used as a basis for deciding social policy issues like contraceptives. Critics have also noted that this decision is inconsistent with the original understanding of the Constitution and Bill of Rights, which are based on written language from the 18th century. In Griswold v Connecticut, Chief Justice Earl Warren wrote in dissent that "the majority opinion today *** the plain meaning of the words 'due process' as they were understood at the time those amendments were ratified." The decision also received a stern rebuke from Justice Hugo Black who said: "I cannot join this perversion of due process. I believe that it was not intended by either its authors or adopters and is certainly wholly inconsistent with the original understanding of the Constitution and should be overruled." Justice Potter Stewart, in a concurring opinion, wrote that he would have voted to strike down the Connecticut law on First Amendment grounds, but not due process. Justice Black's dissent was joined by Justices John Marshall Harlan II, Byron White and William J. Brennan Jr., who added an important footnote in their joint dissent: "It seems clear that if this Court can find a right to privacy under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, it may be able to find other 'penumbras' (in Griswold v Connecticut) protected by the Bill of Rights." Since then, there has been no shortage of dissents in decisions involving controversial social issues. In Roe v Wade, Justice Black wrote a passionate and eloquent dissent: "I cannot join this perversion *** ...The Court's holding today that the Due Process Clause protects a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy is wholly without foundation in law or history. The Court has no power under our Constitution, nor does it have responsibility for the performance of duties entrusted by our Constitution." Justice Black's dissent was joined by Justices Hugo Black and Potter Stewart as well as Chief Justice Earl Warren (who did not join this specific part of Roe v Wade but wrote a separate concurring opinion that has become famous.) The Court also heard 480 cases on abortion between its ruling in Roe v Wade and the landmark decision in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v Casey (1992). Justice Antonin Scalia, who dissented in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v Casey, wrote: "I would overrule Roe and get rid of this whole line of cases." He continued to criticize the majority opinion saying that it was rooted in a "dubious theory" which is inconsistent with history. The decision was also criticized by Justice Clarence Thomas who said: "Roe v Wade did not make abortion into a fundamental right; instead, Roe made rights and duties out of thin air." The Court's decisions on social issues are controversial, but they represent the application of the law to specific facts. The legal process is meant to be deliberative and it would have been unwise for Chief Justice Earl Warren to dismiss these dissents as mere political rhetoric rather than valid concerns about how best to interpret the Constitution.
