Mais de 100 estudantes da Columbia foram presos após recusarem-se a deixar um acampamento de protesto pró-Palestina

Over 100 arrests of students at Columbia after they refused to leave a pro-Palestine protest camp on the main campus of the university. Since then, these arrests have triggered a series of events, including the reinstallation of the protest camp and solidarity protests at other university campuses in the USA.

On Tuesday, Columbia announced that it will offer online classes to try to "redefine" the situation on campus. See what we know about what is happening at Columbia.

Students began installing a protest camp in the center of the Columbia campus on Wednesday of last week, building tents on the lawn of the Upper Manhattan campus. The protesters said they would occupy the lawn until the university divested from companies with ties to Israel.

The camp was monitored with the testimony of the Columbia president, Minouche Shafik, on the university's response to antisemitism, which was held on that day on the university campus.

On Wednesday night, the university began alerting protesters that those who still occupied the lawn would be arrested. On Thursday afternoon, New York police arrested 108 students who were at the camps.

Many of the students who were arrested were temporarily suspended by the university, including Isra Hirsi, a student at Barnard, which is affiliated with Columbia. Hirsi is the daughter of the US congressman Ilhan Omar.

During a press conference later that day, New York police commissioner Edward Caban said: "The students who were arrested were peaceful, they offered no resistance and they were saying what they wanted to say."

In an email to the university community, Shafik said she had asked the PDNY to clear the camp, as it "severely disrupts life on campus and creates an intimidating and hostile environment for many of our students."

The repression was condemned by a group of professors who said they were "astounded"
