Gambino Slots Casino: Specializing in slots entertainment for all types of players, Gambino Slots offers over 10,00 Written by Yasmina Omar Date Published: May 24, 2024 Humans have been altering the composition and function of their brains since ancient times. For thousands of years people sought to enhance or change mental abilities for survival, well-being, spiritual purposes and enjoyment through dietary supplements such as cocoa beans, ginkgo biloba (GB), poppy seed oil, cannabis plants, and opium. Nowadays the use of natural nootropic agents has increased dramatically due to their safety profile compared to pharmaceutical alternatives. However, there are still concerns about side effects or potential toxicity when used for prolonged periods. Although many traditional remedies have been shown to be safe and effective in improving cognitive abilities, little is known about the long-term effect on the brain after chronic use of these agents. In our lab we are interested in understanding how natural nootropics act at synaptic level (brain's functional units) as well as neurons, by examining their impact on key molecular targets involved in memory and learning such as glutamate receptors, mitochondria, neurotransmitters, hormones, or immune system. We believe that these agents will be a safe way of treating cognitive disorders like age-related forgetfulness while also boosting mental performance for healthy individuals looking to improve their wellbeing and quality of life. Natural nootropic supplements are often marketed as "smart drugs" but they do not have the side effects of prescription medications used in neuropsychiatry (e.g., Ritalin, Adderall, Concerta) or cognitive enhancement drugs such as Provigil and Modafinil. These pharmaceuticals are commonly prescribed to treat attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), narcolepsy and sleep-wake cycle disorders, obesity, chronic fatigue syndrome and even depression in some cases. In fact, they have been linked with increased risk of heart attack or stroke. Nootropics are a class of drugs that may be able to improve cognitive function, especially executive functions including working memory capacity, processing speed, attention, learning, and mental stamina. They have also been shown to provide relief from symptoms of ADHD such as impulsivity, inattention and hyperactivity. While nootropic supplements are available over the counter, they can be expensive especially when taken for long periods of time. The price is often driven by perceived value rather than scientific evidence supporting their effectiveness or safety (1). Some people may try them without proper medical advice and some individuals use natural nootropics as a way to enhance academic performance in school/college, while others see it as an alternative treatment for ADHD. Natural nootropic compounds are derived from plants, fungi, or animals whereas synthetic ones are created by laboratory methods such as chemical reactions and modification of existing molecules. These differences can lead to varying efficacy and safety profiles (2). There is a growing body of evidence that natural products have been used successfully for centuries to treat mental disorders like Alzheimer's disease, depression and ADHD in addition to providing cognitive enhancement effects. The history of nootropic research dates back to the 1960s when Julius Axelrod (Nobel Prize winner in physiology or medicine) first described the neurotransmitter acetylcholine as a modulator and regulator of memory and learning processes. In recent years, scientists have found that many nootropic compounds can enhance cognition by interacting with various receptors located within neurons such as N-methyl D-aspartate (NMDA) receptor (3). Natural compounds often act on multiple targets and provide a more comprehensive effect compared to synthetic agents, which tend to have a singular mechanism of action. For example, the combination of lion's mane mushroom and piracetam has been shown in animal models to improve memory retention by increasing acetylcholine levels (4). However, it is important to note that not all natural compounds are safe for everyone or may interact with other medications. For example, Ginkgo biloba can cause bleeding in people who take anticoagulants such as warfarin and coumadin. Also, while the majority of studies have shown positive effects on cognitive functions, more research is needed to evaluate their long-term safety profile when used for chronic conditions like ADHD or age-related mental decline (5). In summary, natural nootropics are a promising class of compounds that may enhance brain health and function while reducing the risk of side effects associated with pharmaceuticals. Although more research is needed to fully understand their mechanisms of action and long-term safety, current evidence supports their use as an alternative or complementary approach for improving cognitive abilities in both healthy individuals and those affected by neurological disorders. Written by Kendra A. Middaugh and Jennifer J. Shirk In our last article, we discussed some of the key elements to a successful job search: how you market yourself as an employee; networking, both online and offline; identifying what jobs are available in your field; and having an effective resume and cover letter for applying to those jobs. This month's topic is about interviewing—a critical step toward landing the job that fits best with who you are and where you want your career to go. In their article, "Interview Preparation" on The Muse website, authors Jennifer J. Shirk and Kendra A. Middaugh offer readers a number of helpful tips for preparing before an interview ("Know Your Background"; "Dress Appropriately"; and "Research the Company"). But in this article we are going to focus on what you can do during your actual job interview, with some guidance from our friends at The Muse. We have included their helpful suggestions below:

8. Be prepared to talk about yourself. Your resume is important (we've written about it here), but when you arrive for the interview, your interviewer wants to get a sense of who you are and what makes you unique as an employee. One way to accomplish this goal is by preparing some examples that showcase your skills in action. The Muse suggests using the STAR method (Situation-Task-Action-Result) approach for responding to behavioral interview questions, which allows you to highlight relevant experiences and quantify their impact on past employers: "For example, if asked about a time when you demonstrated leadership during a project, prepare a specific situation in your work history where you led the team. Describe the task that required you to lead, what actions did you take as a leader? How many people were involved? What was the outcome of the project?" The Muse also recommends preparing responses for common interview questions: "Do not be caught off guard by these types of questions during your job search process. Instead, prepare specific answers that highlight relevant qualifications and experiences." Some examples from The Muse's list include:
 9. Why should we hire you?
 10. What is your greatest professional strength or weakness?

11. How do you work well in a team environment?
 12. Where do you see yourself in five years?
 13. Describe an instance when you didn't get along with someone at work. (And then how you handled the situation to keep working together.)
 14. Why are you leaving your current position? "Avoid these 'filler' answers, like: I am looking for a new challenge; or I am simply exploring my career options." In addition to preparing some responses in advance, The Muse also recommends practicing with friends and family beforehand. This can help you refine your message while getting feedback on how you are coming across as well (not only what you're saying).
 15. Ask questions during the interview. It is natural for a candidate to want more information about an organization; it will help you determine if this company or position would be a good fit, and it demonstrates that you have already done your research on them. The Muse suggests asking these types of questions: "How does my work align with the company's mission? What kind of growth opportunities exist here?"
 16. Maintain positive body language during the interview. Aside from verbal communication, nonverbal cues are also important for a successful job search. According to The Muse, some things you can do in this regard include: "Maintaining eye contact with your interviewer; leaning slightly forward (not too far) while listening and nodding when appropriate." Other helpful hints involve avoiding touchy topics like money or salary during the interview—and waiting until later to discuss these issues, if at all.
