Administering a school is challenging enough; it takes leadership, planning skills, organizational ability, and the motivation that comes from knowing you have students depending upon you. When you add into your role as principal or vice-principal not only these qualities but also an ever increasing set of rules and regulations for which to monitor adherence, and it is easy to see why principals and other school administrators sometimes feel overwhelmed by their responsibilities. While a high level of motivation is necessary in order for you as a principal or vice-principal to be successful at your job, there are some techniques that can help ensure your success even when the odds seem stacked against you. Today's article will offer four such strategies and discuss how they relate not only to motivation but also to leadership skills, planning abilities, organizational prowess and more.

So take a look at these ideas and consider whether or not any of them might apply in your school as well! 1) Take the time to celebrate small successes with your staff and students.

One of the biggest mistakes that school administrators can make is assuming they are too busy for such trivial tasks, like taking an extra moment to congratulate a student on their hard work or expressing gratitude towards a teacher who has gone above and beyond in her role as an educator. When you take time each day (even if it's only five minutes) to recognize the positive contributions made by students and teachers alike, everyone around you will feel more motivated and valued for their efforts. And this can have a tremendous impact on your ability to lead effectively within your school community. 2) Set realistic goals that are specific enough so all members of your team know exactly what is expected of them but also flexible enough that they don't get discouraged when these expectations aren't met. The key here is balance; you want to set high standards while still being reasonable about how quickly those goals can be achieved. When it comes time for evaluation and feedback, make sure everyone understands what was expected of them so that they have a clear understanding of where improvements need to be made. 3) Be present when needed but don't micromanage every aspect of your school's operations - trust in the abilities of others will help build morale within your team and give you more time for planning, organizing tasks ahead of schedule so that they can be completed with greater efficiency than if left until later. 4) Take care of yourself! This might seem like an obvious point but it's one that is often overlooked by busy administrators who are trying to do everything in their power just to keep up with the demands placed upon them each day at work. Without proper rest and relaxation techniques (such as exercise or meditation), burnout will set in eventually leading not only to decreased motivation levels but also potentially resulting in mistakes that could have serious consequences for your school community if left unchecked long enough... 5) Remember why you got into this profession in the first place - For most principals, it was because they wanted nothing more than to make a difference in children's lives through education and mentoring. Don't lose sight of that reason as time goes on; even when things get tough or seem impossible at times (and trust me, there will be those moments), try your best every day so future generations can benefit from the impact you are making right now! So if any of these strategies resonate with you or sound like something that could help improve your motivation as a principal/vice-principal in your school community - give them a shot and see what happens. And remember, even though it's natural to feel overwhelmed by all the responsibilities placed upon us when taking up leadership roles within educational institutions... we are capable of handling these challenges if only because we love our jobs enough not just for ourselves but also those whom we serve daily through them!
